

Solution:

Cash equivalents are those assets that are highly liquid and can be easily converted to cash on demand at any epoch. These are, hence, equivalent to cash and can be accepted by any institutions readily. Such equivalents are often a useful indicator of the cash health of the company.

For example, cash held as notes, in bank accounts or as government bonds could be considered as cash equivalents as they are secure and can be accepted by any institution.